Myth	Fact
Emotions are either “good” or bad”. There is no in between.	Emotions aren't simply "good" or "bad"; they serve important purposes in our lives. For instance, fear alerts us to danger, guilt reminds us of our values, and anger can motivate us to assert ourselves. Can you recall a time when an uncomfortable emotion helped you?
There is a correct way to experience emotions.	When our emotions are not in line with our expectations, we might feel frustrated or confused. What’s true is that two people will experience different emotional responses to the same situation. Because of this, there’s no “correct” way to feel. Have you forced yourself to feel a certain way? When does that happen to you?
Talking about my emotions is not important.	Talking about emotions is more than just problem-solving. You can get a sense of how you’re feeling when you talk about your emotions. This helps makes situations feel more manageable and can give you a new perspective. When was a time that talking about your feelings made them more workable?

People will think less of me if I show my emotions.	Showing your emotions to other people can feel scary. but it's a powerful tool for building relationships. By being open, you appear authentic and relatable, fostering healthier connections. When have you found it difficult to express your feelings honestly?
If I am feeling too much, I will lose control of myself.	Many people fear experiencing difficult emotions due to the worry of losing control. Yet, denying these feelings often gives them more power than acknowledging them. What emotions do you hesitate to feel, and why?
I should feel happy all the time. If I'm not happy, then there's something wrong with me.	Happiness is a positive feeling, but it's not realistic to expect it all the time. Viewing happiness as a temporary emotion can enhance your appreciation for it. This perspective helps you avoid self-blame during moments of sadness. Do you pressure yourself to be positive or happy all the time? How does that make you feel?

Myth	Fact
Logic is more reliable than emotions.	To have a balanced perspective, we need both logic and emotion. Logic is good for problem solving or thinking about different options, but emotions tell us what we really want and care about. Do you use more of logic or emotion in decision-making? What does balance look like?
I always trust my feelings and they are always true.	It's important to be aware of our emotions, but we should be careful in how we interpret them. For instance, feeling intense jealousy towards a partner can lead us to make assumptions. What was a time where you had an emotion that caused a false assumption? What did you do to redirect your emotions?
Women are more emotional than men. And men are more logical.	Research indicates that while men and women feel the same emotions, they often express them differently. Societal expectations can lead people to share their emotions inauthentically. Have you felt any pressure to show or not show emotions in a certain way due to your gender?
Other people control the way I feel.	While other people's actions can influence our feelings, ultimately, we control our own emotions and responses. When have you blamed other people for how you feel? How did you reflect on this?
