Worry Time

What is worry? Worrying is the act of thinking about and predicting negative outcomes of situations or events that have not happened yet. When we worry, we focus more on hypothetical situations and the risks associated so that we can prepare for the worst outcome. While this "risk-avoidant thinking style" might seem helpful, it actually increases anxiety and hinder problem-solving skills.

Use this activity to break down a worry that you have, and give yourself dedicated time to think through this worry to better manage your feelings and outcomes.

Explaining your worry

Name the worry that feels most present right now.
What do you think will happen?
Are you experiencing distressing feelings? Rate from 0-10
Give yourself time to suspend this worry for later.

Thinking through your worry

What is the worst outcome?
What evidence do I have that this negative outcome will occur?
What is the best outcome?
What evidence do I have that this positive outcome will occur?
What's the likeliest result based on what is known?
What do you think will happen if you worry about this?
If you friend had the same worry, what would you tell them?
Do you trust yourself to let go of this worry?	If yes, rate worry 0-10 If no, continue reading the next questions
What are some problem-solving options open to you?
What is your course of action?
Has your perspective on this worry shifted? How so?
Have your initial thoughts about the worry changed?
How much is this worry affecting you right now? Rate from 0-10	